Newsletter: Copy Date

The copy deadline for the next Newsletter is 20 March 2015 (for the May 2015 issue). Please send items for inclusion by email (as MS Word attachments) to: rhbg.lamas@gmail.com, or by mail to me, Richard Gilpin, Honorary Editor, LAMAS Newsletter, c/o Museum of London, London Wall, London EC2Y 5HN. It would be greatly appreciated if contributors could please ensure that items sent by mail are addressed to me and not to any of the previous editors.

So much material has been submitted for inclusion in this issue that it has had to grow from the usual 28 pages to 32. The Editor offers his apologies to contributors for the inadvertent omission of any material, and regrets that there has been no room for Conferences and Courses.

TREASURER

A unique opportunity has arisen to make a positive contribution to London archaeology and local history and to work alongside enthusiastic and able colleagues. LAMAS seeks a new Treasurer. This responsible post requires integrity, common sense, ease with a computer, and communication skills. A modicum of financial acumen is desirable, but not paramount. Full induction to the post and ongoing support will be given as required. For more information or an informal chat, contact Stuart Forbes, the LAMAS Independent Examiner (email: stuart.s.forbes@gmail.com, or telephone: 020 8778 4164).

New members needed for Local History Committee

LAMAS Local History Committee is seeking new members. The committee meets three times a year, and between meetings members (who attend as individual members of LAMAS or as representatives of their affiliated Local History Society) carry forward the decisions of the committee. More details of the committee may be found on the local history pages of the LAMAS website. If you are interested in joining, please contact either Eileen Bowlt on 01895 638060 (email: c.bowl@tiscali.co.uk) or John Hinshelwood on 020 8348 3375 (email: johnhinshelwood@btinternet.com).

Annual General Meeting and Presidential Address: Gog and Magog: a tale of three giants, John Clark

According to Geoffrey of Monmouth, writing in the 12th century, Britain (previously known as Albion) had first been colonized by Trojans, descendants of those who had fled after the destruction of Troy by the Greeks. However, they found the land already inhabited by a race of giants, and the largest and strongest of them was Goemagot, or Gogmagog.

Where did these giants come from? What was the fate of Gogmagog? How was he later transformed into two giants, Gog and Magog? And how, as ‘the Giants in Guildhall’, did Gog and Magog come to be regarded as symbols and guardians of the very city that, as ‘New Troy’ or ‘Trinovantum’, those same Trojans had founded as their capital?

John Stow and the mystery of the quill pen

Members of LAMAS will know that every three years a service is held at St Andrew Undershaft church, in the City, in commemoration of John Stow, Tudor historian and author of the Survey of London – the most recent occasion being in April 2014. The 17th-century monument to Stow, paid for by his widow, stands in the north-east corner of the church. It shows Stow seated at a table, with a (real) quill pen in his hand. At the end of the service there is a short ceremony in which Stow's old quill pen is replaced by a new one.

The service is now jointly sponsored by LAMAS and the Worshipful Company of Merchant Taylors (Stow's own company), and LAMAS Council is currently in discussions with the Company about future arrangements.

There is a puzzle, however. The ‘quill ceremony’ is one of those ‘since time immemorial’ customs whose actual origins are difficult to pin down. The earliest public mention of it that I’ve found so far is a brief newspaper report in April 1914, which merely states ‘To mark the anniversary of the death of John Stow the historian of London, a new quill pen was placed in the hand of his statue at the City church of St. Andrew Undershaft, on Sunday [5 April].’ Four years later, in 1918, it was described as ‘usual’ and as ‘the annual ceremony of renewing the quill pen’. That year it was attended by members of LAMAS ‘and of other societies’, and Lady Brabrook, wife of Sir Edward Brabrook, then President of LAMAS, replaced the quill. At this time, the event seems to have been quite small-scale and informal – it isn’t even mentioned in LAMAS’s own annual reports.

In June 1922, however, there was a special service (in which LAMAS seems to have played no part) to mark the restoration of the Stow monument, attended by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, which included an address on Stow’s work by C L Kingsford, London historian and editor of Stow’s Survey of London. The success of this event seems to have inspired LAMAS’s Council to approach the Rector with the suggestion that there should be an annual service in future, with an address by a London historian, and incorporating the ‘quill ceremony’. The first of these was held on 8 April 1924. It was attended by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and attracted over 300 people.

In the 1930s LAMAS established an annual essay competition for schools in the London area. The winner attended the Stow Service to receive a book prize, together with the old quill pen. Prizes continued to be awarded until the 1960s.

These services continued annually right through the Second World War without interruption. However, the service in 1992 had to be cancelled because of extensive damage to the church caused by the IRA bomb that destroyed the nearby Baltic Exchange. The service was revived in 1994, but since 1996 it has been held only once every three years.

The puzzle remains – when and how did the ‘quill ceremony’ originate? The answer may lie in LAMAS’s own records. But perhaps one of LAMAS’s members may have come across references to it earlier than 1914. Is there any connection with the similar ceremony that has taken place occasionally at the monument to William Shakespeare in Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-upon-Avon?

REVIEWS

The Historic Buildings and Conservation Committee organised two Seminars in conjunction with the London Forum. The first, in June, was about High Buildings (a fuller write-up is available in the London Forum newsletter; Summer 2014). The second, in September, was a Training Workshop entitled ‘Getting your Voice Heard’.

High Buildings

The first speaker was Rowan Moore who, with others, launched the Skyline Campaign, prompted by the 200 towers of over 20 storeys planned for London – of which the public were largely unaware. Heritage guidance on design seems inadequate, and insufficient thought is being given to the effect, context and quality of an individual building. There are many examples of buildings in the wrong place and, while the argument has already been lost on many sites, the future is worth fighting for. A major concern is the nature of the ground level areas around towers and the lack of design co-ordination when there is a group of towers. If tall buildings are essential to meet our needs, they must be better considered.

Michael Bach gave some history on the development of tall buildings in London from Old St Paul’s, with its 14th century, 149m tower through to the 20th century with a few office towers such as the NatWest (1980), Canary Wharf development (1991), and then the 306m tall Shard at London Bridge in 2012. Residential buildings included the Trellick Tower (1971) and Barbican Estate (1965 to 1976). An outline of the various Regulations and Statutes including the 1976 GLDP, London Building Act 1994, and the Mayor’s Policy and call-in powers led to the conclusion that planning can be reactive or proactive, controlling or proposing; development can be slow and natural or urged to rapid growth of buildings.

Robert Ayton identified a trend for Local Authorities to try to limit the height of Tall Buildings. Westminster commissioned a study in 2006 that revealed only Paddington as a possible area for high rise development. The London Plan requires high standards of design and materials and no negative impact, but there are some horror stories such as the Strata and Vauxhall Towers, both residential. Decisions on towers are made in the light of guidance including NPPF, London Plan, Heritage setting, site setting, protected views and Opportunity Areas but these do not always lead to the right decision, and the development at Vauxhall will be a mix of various shapes and styles which will not form a harmonious whole.

I gave an historical perspective citing medieval towers built in San Gimignano, the only purpose of which was to display the builder’s wealth; a parallel maybe with the aims of some developers in the City. Most new towers will be residential, and an example in Southampton Way showed that high density does not require high rise. Other points were that Thames-side development creates a wall of buildings blocking views; views are not narrow but need context (eg the Shard dominating St Paul's); major transport interchanges seem sustainable but many are historic centres and need care if redeveloped and, while some high buildings are now Listed, historic buildings are easily over-shadowed as at Hopton Street.

The Convoys Wharf proposals show the need for better policies and better consideration of high buildings Applications in terms of context, heritage and views. There is also new Guidance from English Heritage/Design Council; currently out for consultation.

The Committee is hoping to organise a follow up Seminar concentrating on high buildings in the City; looking at how policy has guided the Eastern Cluster, how buildings and spaces have been designed and, crucially, how future development and policy is evolving, with high buildings edging into areas just outside the City.

'Getting your Voice Heard'

The aim of the Seminar was to help local amenity or history societies understand how to frame their responses to planning and heritage issues, and to be more effective in influencing Local Planning Authorities while at the same time helping the Planners by addressing relevant policy matters. The first speaker was Duncan McCallum of English Heritage (EH) – soon to be Historic England – who outlined the changes to EH and the challenges ahead. He pointed out that EH depended very heavily upon volunteers whose work was becoming increasingly important. Those disputing Applications needed to act early, make justifiable assertions, and persist.

The chief speaker/coordinator of the Workshop was David McDonald, a Heritage Consultant specialising in Training, formerly Head of Conservation and Urban Design at the Royal Borough of Kensington & Chelsea, and now the IHBC (Institute of Historic Building Conservation) Education Secretary. He started by showing a picture of the Gorbals where slum dwellings were being demolished and vast blocks of flats by Basil Spence were arising in the background. Now the flats were being demolished, and the older tenements (where they survived) were being refurbished and were highly sought after housing; conservation is not always a fixed science.

David said the Workshop would be interactive and stressed the importance of representations, using the Smithfield Market proposals as an example – approved by the Planning Authority, supported by EH, but opposed by a number of Amenity Groups (including LAMAS/CBA), it was refused after a Public Inquiry. He outlined ways to make effective representations and set out issues that are valid and those that are not. The former included impact on a Conservation Area, layout, density, appearance and materials; the latter, loss of property values or of a view, effect of construction work, ownership, and political issues or character of the applicant. ‘Read like a writer; write like a reader’ was a good guide, as was ‘think like a Planning Inspector’.

Inspectors clearly summarised the key issues that needed to be identified and evaluated. This should be reinforced by reference to planning regulations, both the National Planning Policy Framework and Local Authority Development Plan, and the contents of the objection should be clearly set out. David then moved on to the proposal to be examined: a scheme for the re-development of a small pair of mews dwellings. Participants were asked to identify the issues that led them to either approve or dismiss the proposal, which was for a radical new building.

There then was a discussion and further consideration of the proposals with a check list of items to be addressed: what is proposed; what are the Heritage Assets affected; significance (including local knowledge); impact; harm; and reference to the NPPF, Development Plan and to Local Guidance. A template was suggested for comments to the Planning Authority including: your identity and contact details; application reference/description; bullet points of objections; the heritage asset, its significance, impact of the proposal, harm it would do, planning policies involved; recommend refusal and, if wanted, request the opportunity to attend the Committee.

When appearing at a committee, thank the Chairman; always keep to your allowed time; limit objections to three main issues; never mention Council Officers or the Applicant and remember the issues that are valid and those that are not. The Seminar was a useful clarification of what can be a tricky and confusing matter; mostly it seems obvious but often clarity and brevity are submerged by enthusiasm, exasperation or too much detail, and the Workshop was very helpful in making effective representations.

Again, the Committee is hoping to hold a follow up seminar in the New Year, but this will only be possible if there is sufficient interest from individuals or societies who think it would be useful for them to attend either because there are other society members who would benefit, or because you missed it the first time round. In either case, if you are interested please contact Peter Pickering at pe.pickering@virgin.net

LAMAS 49th Local History Conference: 22 November 2014
Coppers, Crooks & Counsel: Law & Order in London'

The Conference was opened by John Clark, President of LAMAS, followed by Dr Penny Tucker, historical author.

In her talk 'Portals of the Law: How People Got Access to Justice in Medieval London', Dr Tucker highlighted the case of Henry Hoggys, a chapman from Whitchurch, Buckinghamshire, who having borrowed £50 from a London Mercer, petitioned against the usurious terms of the loan in the Mayor's Court in 1460. Apparently he could not write. He appeared as an 'Orator', rather than pay an attorney to represent him, and the clerk wrote down his complaint, complete with repetitions, as he spoke. The Mayor and Aldermen ordered a Commission of two Aldermen and four Commoners to examine both Hoggys and the Mercer. The humble Hoggys, far from home, could produce neither written evidence nor witnesses to support him, whereas four London Citizens spoke on the Mercer's behalf. Nonetheless, even as a 'foreign' (non-Citizen) he had access to the Court of Husting and Mayor's Court if the case involved a Citizen, and unrestricted access to the Sheriff's Court, and seems to have been given a fair hearing.

The second speaker was Tim Hitchcock, Professor of Digital History at the University of Sussex. Under the title 'Getting up Close and Personal with the Dead. The experience of the Courtroom and Transportation', he demonstrated how individual lives can now be traced in detail, using resources such as the Old Bailey Online website. His main case study was an eighteenth-century man, Thomas Olympus, who was convicted of stealing a handkerchief. Olympus was sentenced to the 'hulks', floating prison ships; then on a second conviction he was sent to prison, and on a third conviction sentenced to transportation. He was sent to Gorée on the west coast of Africa but released as there was no food for convicts. On returning to London he was sent to the hulks again and finally in 1787 transported to Australia with the First Fleet of convicts. Some prisoners declared they would rather die than be transported but over the next eighty years huge numbers of convicts were sent to New South Wales. Professor Hitchcock concluded his talk with information about his latest project, which aims to recreate the eighteenth century Old Bailey courtroom by means of a virtual replica. Using special software, original plans and contemporary images, he believes his digital replica will enable us to understand the eighteenth-century courtroom as a community-based court.

The morning ended with the presentation of the 2014 Local History Publications Awards by John Hinshelwood, Secretary of the Local History Committee. The book prize went to Sunbury and Shepperton Local History Society for The History of Walton Bridge, by Nick Pollard. The Journal prize was awarded to Southgate Civic Trust for Oakleaves, the 2013 issue of their local history bulletin.

The first speaker after lunch was Jerry White, Professor of History at Birkbeck, who spoke about 'The Police of London in Transition 1750-1850'. He began by explaining that until the mid-nineteenth century policing meant prevention rather than detection. By far the greatest impact on Londoners was through the work of the constables and the night watchmen paid for by ratepayers and only operational in certain wards. The watchmen were paid nightly and supervised by a beadle. The constables examined suspects arrested by the watchmen, and only operated in the hours of darkness. In spite of occasional drunkenness or corruption, the system of constables and watchmen worked effectively.

By 1820 the system needed to expand. Wards were too parochial to allow for effective policing, and in 1820 Bow Street patrols began to operate during the day-time. In 1829 Sir Robert Peel, following the advice of a number of parliamentary commissions, called for central government control, and the police force as we would recognise it came into being. The detection of crime developed in later decades.

The next speaker was Alex Werner, Head of History at the Museum of London, speaking on 'London's Prisons in the 19th Century'. He began by reminding us that the prisons of nineteenth-century London are still very much with us, and that they were built in response to the changed requirements of the penal system. Larger prisons were needed to accommodate rising numbers of convicts – created by limitations on transportation and less capital punishment. Debtors' prisons were not for criminals, and were very different.

Rising numbers and changing theories meant that many prisons were soon out of date. The initial panopticon, or constant surveillance, type of prison, (such as Millbank, Tothill Fields, Pentonville) gave way to separated blocks (such as Brixton, Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubs). By the Victorian period, women convicts were housed in separate wings, but then an entire female prison was built at Holloway. This was a well-illustrated talk which drew on items from the National Archives, LMA and in particular the Museum of London: this has many objects and photographs from Old Newgate, including relics of Elizabeth Fry. The illustrations ranged from conviction sheets to mug-shots; from pointless treadmills to nastier punishments. Pictures of the buildings came as a light relief.

The final talk of the day took the title 'Detectives in Fiction', and was delivered by Dr Kathryn Johnson, curator of the modern drama collections at the British Library and also of their 'Murder in the Library' exhibition last year. She began with a brief background, outlining the beginning of the Metropolitan Police Force and later the Criminal Investigation Department, but then turned to the fictional representations of detectives.

An important early figure was Jack Whicher, who was probably the model for Sergeant Cuff in Wilkie Collins's The Moonstone. He has recently become more famous through modern fiction and a television series. Dr Johnson continued with references to different authors from that time until the present: Dickens, Conan Doyle, Christie, Allingham, Sayers, P D James [who sadly died as the Newsletter was going to press] and many others. She said that writers needed to have an affinity with the detectives they create, and that most fictional detectives have foibles or weaknesses. This was an interesting and entertaining talk, with many recommendations for good books to read.

Summaries of the Conference provided by Eileen Bowlt, Diane Tough, Eleanor Stanier, Pat Clarke and Patricia Gough.

The LAMAS Book Prize

The LAMAS Book Prize announced at the Local History Conference went to Sunbury and Shepperton Local History Society for The History of Walton Bridge, by Nick Pollard (2013), Sunbury and Shepperton Local History Society, A4, 60 pages, colour illustrations, no price given, ISBN 0 905178 32 7.

This nicely illustrated softback book tells the history of the river crossing at Walton from the earliest ford and ferry to the building of the sixth bridge, which opened in 2013. Nick Pollard traces the long and chequered history of the various bridges that involved private enterprise, public funds, total collapse, wartime bombing, bankruptcy, legal disputes and two world famous artists. It concludes with four poems commissioned from Joseph Butler by the Costain Group, builders of the last bridge. The book is clearly laid out with a good sized font that makes it very easy to read. A fuller review of this book will appear in the forthcoming volume of LAMAS Transactions.

Two other books were shortlisted:

Mitcham Histories: 14, Upper Mitcham and Western Road, E N Montague (2013), Merton Historical Society, A5, 227 pages, black and white illustrations, Series Index to all 14 Histories, price not given, ISBN 978-1-903899-68-7.

This is the last in the series of Mitcham Histories, begun in 2001 and all written by E N Montague, which claims to be one of the most interesting, covering a relatively small area of Mitcham. The history can be traced back nearly 2000 years from the Anglo-Saxon origins of the name, through the land tenure after the Norman Conquest, to the present day which Montague describes in great detail. Although the character and appearance of the district have greatly changed in recent years, Montague's interpretation of the present day landscape reveals the rich history of the area. The Notes and References at the end provide a valuable guide to the sources for those who wish to pursue their own detailed studies. Like the previous volumes in this series, the book provides a coherent narrative of the complex and little-known history of a corner of Mitcham.

The Rookfield Estate; Muswell Hill's Garden Suburb, David Frith (2013), Hornsey Historical Society, A4, 56 pages, colour illustrations, £9.99, ISBN 978-0-90-579447-1.

This richly illustrated book by David Frith describes the background to, and the development of, an estate of private houses at the foot of Muswell Hill in north London by the Collins family. The estate was developed in thirteen stages between 1901 and 1934, and Frith describes the stages of development in detail using colour photographs of the houses and plans and records held in the local authority archive. Such a detailed approach provides a good discussion of architectural style and the accommodation provided by the houses. Although the book is principally about the buildings, Frith also briefly discusses the people who came to live on the estate, mostly in leasehold houses until the Leasehold Reform Act of 1967 allowed them to purchase the freeholds. This book is a timely publication commemorating the incorporation of Rookfield Garden Village Ltd., on 28 August 1913.

The following books were submitted but not shortlisted for the prize:

All Our Stories: The Stories of our Streets and Houses, Francine Payne (ed) (2013), Bexley Archaeological Group, A4, 180 pages, black and white illustrations, no price given, no ISBN.

This book is a report of an excellent initiative by the Bexley Archaeological Group to involve people in follow up to the TV series Great British Story. It is the outcome of five workshops designed to introduce people to local history. The content is seventeen individual reports of research into peoples' houses in Bexley, all of which use maps and photographs. In spite of the good intentions the editor has not drawn the reports together to construct any sort of narrative or reach any conclusion. Whilst it is obvious that the individual contributors have been introduced to the practice of researching their local area, no references are given showing where or how the research was done. The style of report varies from contributor to contributor and all use maps and old or new photographs, but these are not integrated into the text and in several cases it is not clear what they are attempting to illustrate. The good intention behind this project is let down by the unfinished nature of this publication.

Chiswick Children, Val Bott (2013), Brentford & Chiswick Local History Society, 167cm x 190cm, 34 pages, colour illustrations, no price given, ISBN 978 1 899144 01 3.

This descriptive record of an exhibition held at Hogarth's House tells the story of William and Jane Hogarth's love of children. The story was researched by members of the Brentford & Chiswick Local History Society, with the help of the Chiswick Local Studies Library and Hounslow Libraries. It is a good example of what can be achieved by collective effort on a single project. The chronological narrative around the themes of children and schools is well illustrated by the images used in the exhibition. The booklet is well presented in a handy size for an exhibition catalogue, but it lacks any reference to sources and as such fails to make it of much use in any wider research of the education and care of 18th century children.

The Kings Cross Fraudster; Leopold Redpath, his life & times, David A Hayes and Maria Kamlisch (eds) (2013), Camden History Society, 175cm x 245cm, 188 pages, black and white illustrations, price £9.99, ISBN 978 0 904491 87 6.

This closely written book tells a largely forgotten story of railway development through the device of a third party account of the life of Leopold Redpath. In this book the two authors claim to piece together for the first time the various strands of the fraudster's life. The book is a substantial paperback with good black and white illustrations and copious notes and references to each chapter. The intriguing story that is narrated is let down by the poor production of this book: page layouts vary throughout and the text is dense, leaving the reader with the impression that it is a bit of an amateur print job. This is a shame as the content is far from amateurish – as the long list of sources show that a wide range of archival material has been consulted.

John Hinshelwood, on behalf of the Local History Committee

The LAMAS Journal Prize

The LAMAS Journal Prize announced at the Local History Conference went to Southgate District Civic Trust for Oakleaves: The Local History Bulletin of Southgate District Civic Trust edited by Peter Hodge (2013), Southgate District Civic Trust, A4, 60 pages, colour cover, black and white illustrations, no price given, ISSN 0950 5172.

This bulletin of the Civic Trust goes to show that local history is an essential ingredient in the development and functioning of present day civic society. It is a well produced publication and although the font size is slightly small it is an easy to read page layout of two columns. The eight informative articles that follow the full page editorial provide a good range of perspectives in the social history and development of Southgate. Although only two of the articles are supported by notes and references others are clearly based on the author's diaries and recollections, providing a written form of oral history. Many of the photographs included come from personal or other collections not usually examined by local historians. The use of an editorial, also unusual in local history journals, brings all of the articles together to create an overview of the snapshots of early Southgate.

The following three journals were shortlisted for the prize:

Camden History Review 37, David A Hayes (ed) (2013), Camden History Society, A5, paperback, 40 pages, Colour cover, black and white illustrations, price £5.95, ISBN 978-0-904491-89-0.

This edition of the Camden History Review is produced in the style typical of the previous years, which with its four column page layout and small font size makes the six well researched articles more difficult to read than is necessary. As usual the articles are well researched, although two are not supported by references or endnotes. The articles are well illustrated and cover an interesting range of topics and, on the last page, there is a useful index to back copies of the Review.

Hornsey Historical Society Bulletin 54, Albert Pinching (ed) (2013), Hornsey Historical Society, A4, paperback, colour cover, black and white illustrations, price £6.50, ISSN 0955 8071.

The Hornsey Historical Society continues to produce a high quality presentation of five research articles, five notes and four reviews. The publication is laid out with an easily readable font, and the usual three column page format. The illustrations are nicely varied in size to fit the columns and pages, and make for a varied an interesting layout. The research articles have generally adequate references or notes to support them, and the historical notes are clearly based on research.

Ruislip, Norwood & Eastcote Local History Society Journal, Brian Grisdale (ed) (2013), Ruislip, Norwood & Eastcote Local History

Society, A4, paperback, 54 pages, colour and black and white illustrations, no price given, no ISBN.

This journal carries a good range of research articles together with information and reports on the activities of the Ruislip, Norwood & Eastcote Local History Society. There is also a useful index to past journals since 1978. Unfortunately only two of the research articles are supported with notes and references, but two others acknowledge that the information has been supplied from named individuals. The publication is easily readable using a two column page layout and is well illustrated with colour pictures where appropriate.

The following Journals were submitted but not shortlisted for the prize:

Pinner Local History Society, News Views Research, newsletters 120 - 122, Spring 2013, Barbra Lanning (ed), Pinner Local History Society, A4, 20 pages, colour and black and white illustrations, no price given, no ISBN.

The three copies of Pinner's local history newsletters contain a mix of news and information in a manner suited to the general reader. The page layout could be improved by using two columns. There are no notes of references but each article is written authoritatively and the information given in clear and concise language. The newsletter, produced three times a year, is just that, and no doubt greatly appreciated by the members of Pinner Local History Society.

Brentford & Chiswick Local History Journal, No 22, 2013, Carolyn Hammond (ed), Brentford & Chiswick Local History Society, A4, paperback, 32 pages, colour cover, black and white illustrations, no price given, no ISBN.

This journal contains seven articles, with few references or even notes on sources. The short editorial claims the articles cast new light on the industries of Brentford and Chiswick, but given the lack of references or sources it is difficult to judge if this is true. This lack of rigour in citing sources undermines the good presentation and clear layout that makes the journal so readable.

Wandsworth Historian: The Journal of the Wandsworth Historical Society, No. 95, 2013, Neil Robson (ed), Wandsworth Historical Society, A4, 26 pages, colour cover, black and white illustrations, price £3.00, no ISBN.

This journal has only three articles, with attached notes and references, together with four pages of Miscellany and two book reviews and an advert for a nineteenth century Print Gallery. It is published as a rather basic journal looking as though it was produced on a good quality photocopier. The layout and illustrations look fine and the font is easily readable but, compared to all the other journals submitted, it falls far behind in the quality of the production.

BOOKS AND PUBLICATIONS

Alexandra Palace Theatre, by Marlene McAndrew (2013), Hornsey Historical Society, 12pp, 8 illustrations plus cover, £3.00 + 60p P&P, ISBN: 978-0-90-579448-8.

This is a useful short history of the second 'Palace' of 1875, which considers the building, its intended audiences, and the entertainments mounted there. Most noteworthy today is the almost complete timber stage machinery, which merited a Grade 2 listing for the building.

Never a success as a theatre, it was briefly profitable as a "kinematograph" from 1900 to 1913, before an unsuccessful return to theatrical use after the Great War. Its subsequent vicissitudes are described, and it is now hoped that the Save Ally Pally group will revitalise the building with assistance from the Heritage Lottery Fund.

Secret Kingston Upon Thames, by Julian McCarthy (2014), Amberley Publishing, 96pp, £14.99, ISBN 978-1-44-564100-3.

The author, a tour guide, has chosen to draw the eyes of members of the public to varied objects of circular design scattered around the historic town centre of Kingston, which are frequently overlooked. Even when noticed, their significance is rarely understood.

The circle motif is a novel way of linking them, and Julian McCarthy weaves their story into the tapestry of the town's past. Plaques, mosaics, clocks, windows, roundels and even the 'coronation' stone encircled by Saxon style ironwork are presented to the reader in a series of beautiful photographs – usually a main picture with two smaller related ones. The 'stories', printed on the accompanying pages, are culled from earlier surveys and accounts of the town, which are listed in a bibliography.

The book, which is an entertaining read, can be used as a guidebook, since it contains clear maps showing the location of each object and lists the streets where the photographs were taken. Readers will be prompted to scan their surroundings with greater care on future walks.

South Kensington Through Time, by Brian Girling (2014), Amberley Publishing, 96pp, £14.99, ISBN 978-1-44-56 2152-4.

This informative book is compiled by Brian Girling, a local author born in South Kensington. His introduction emphasises the importance of the Great Exhibition in 1851 to the growth and development of the South Kensington area, and he concentrates on the way photography has recorded the development of South Kensington since Victorian times. A slightly unusual feature is the inclusion of the Kensington mews and their conversion from stables to houses and educational facilities.

The book follows the usual format of Amberley's "Through Time Series" – a sequence of paired images where the top image is black and white and old and the lower image has been photographed recently in colour. Captions divide the two images, explaining the location and the changes that have taken place over the years. The photographs are quite diverse and include early photographs of the Museums, Harrods and underground stations such as South Kensington and Gloucester Road. Strangely although Harrods is included, there is no mention of Knightsbridge underground station, used by many of its shoppers!

The photographs are good quality and mainly of a uniform size. The captions vary in length but all contain interesting and descriptive information. The book could have benefited from a map to show the extent of the area, but it is an attractive and useful pictorial guide to the local history of South Kensington.

Bounds Green: An interesting corner of Haringey, Albert Pinching (2014), Hornsey Historical Society, A5, 60 pp, colour and black and white illustrations, £8.99, ISBN 978-0-905794-50-1.

Albert Pinching outlines the background history and the early twentieth century development of the suburban district of Wood Green before it was absorbed into the London Borough of Haringey in 1965. The book also includes an itinerary for a walk around the area visiting the key points of interest to be seen today; the map of the area with the key points is shown on a fold-out of the back cover.

The history and walk are a useful addition to the various publications, by the Hornsey Historical Society and others, that describe the development of the north London suburbs. The book is well illustrated with maps, old and modern photographs, drawings and watercolours and postcard illustrations, all of which convey the richly diverse nature of the modern suburb.

The history and the walk thus cover a time span from the 17th to the 21st century – no mean feat in only 60 pages. It will be of interest to all those interested in the urban development of London suburbs, as the 99 endnotes provide a valuable guide to sources for further research. The publication will also be of interest to local residents and prospective home buyers, as it conveys a sense of civic pride in the district – all too easily missed in the daily commute to the outer reaches of the Piccadilly Line, with its iconic station buildings from the 1930s.

Hospitals of London, by Veronica & Fred Chambers & Rob Higgins (2014), published by Amberley Publishing, paperback, 128 pages, approx 100 images, £14.99, ISBN 978-1-4456-3809-6.

For over two hundred years the hospitals of London have been treating patients from the capital and beyond, and many of these institutions have been internationally respected teaching centres. Some have survived from the early days; others have been closed and demolished.

This well-illustrated book looks not only at the bricks and mortar of London's hospitals, but also discusses the social and political background that has influenced their dispensation of care.

There are separate sections for Undergraduate Teaching Hospitals; Postgraduate and Specialist Hospitals; and Hospitals for the Mentally Ill. The London area is divided into four regional sections. An index is provided.
